The man who invented Vegemite was Cyril Callister, an Australian chemist. Callister was born in 1895 in Victoria, Australia. He studied chemistry at the University of Melbourne, and after graduating, he worked as a chemist for several different companies.

In 1922, Callister was working for the Fred Walker & Co. food company when he was asked to develop a new food product. The company had been experimenting with using brewer's yeast extract to make a food spread, and Callister was tasked with finding a way to make the spread more palatable.

Callister experimented with different ingredients and proportions, and eventually he developed a recipe for a thick, black spread that he called Vegemite. The name Vegemite is derived from the Latin word "vegetabilis", which means "vegetable".

Callister's new food spread was not an instant success. In fact, it took several years for Vegemite to catch on with consumers. But eventually, Vegemite became a popular breakfast food in Australia, and it's now one of the country's most iconic foods.

Callister died in 1959, but his legacy lives on through Vegemite. Vegemite is still one of Australia's most popular foods, and it's enjoyed by people all over the world.

In 2015, a book was published about Callister and his invention of Vegemite. The book, titled "The Man Who Invented Vegemite", tells the story of Callister's life and work, and it provides a fascinating glimpse into the history of one of Australia's most iconic foods.
