As the affair intensifies, Ruth and Judd hatch a sinister plot to eliminate Albert and collect on his life insurance policy. With Ruth's knowledge of poisons from her background as a nurse's aide, they devise a plan to administer lethal doses of cyanide.

On the fateful evening of March 20, 1927, Ruth invites Albert for dinner at their home, where Judd has surreptitiously laced the meal with cyanide. After consuming the poisoned food, Albert collapses and dies in agony.

The murder sends shockwaves through New York City and beyond. Ruth and Judd initially attempt to cover up their crime, but their lies and inconsistencies quickly unravel. The police soon uncover the scandalous affair and the gruesome details of the cyanide poisoning.

The ensuing trial becomes a media sensation, with the nation enthralled by the lurid details of the love triangle and the shocking murder. Ruth, depicted as a cold-hearted seductress, and Judd, portrayed as a ruthless accomplice, become the subject of intense public scrutiny and condemnation.

In a dramatic twist, Ruth changes her plea to guilty and implicates Judd in the plot. She is sentenced to die in the electric chair, while Judd receives a life sentence.

On January 12, 1928, Ruth Snyder becomes the first woman to be executed in New York's Sing Sing prison. Her execution is a highly publicized event, drawing a massive crowd of onlookers.

The case of Ruth Snyder and Judd Gray remains one of the most notorious and fascinating true crime stories in American history. It exposes the dark depths of human desire, the fragility of love, and the devastating consequences of unchecked ambition.
